The 2007/2008 post-election violence (PEV) remains a black spot in Kenya's national experience since independence. Following the episode, the country was involved in finding ways to restore the livelihoods of affected persons and to engender peaceful coexistence among the populace, particularly in the Rift Valley region which was the epicentre of the violence. Following an almost decade-long process of resettlement of Internally Displaced Persons (IDPs) and peacebuilding; this book presents and analyzes this experience; before proffering pertinent recommendations on the same going forward, particularly in lieu of the 2017 Kenya General Elections and after. Hence, the book is an account of Kenya's experience with transitional justice over this period; one that would interest not only the student of political science, international studies, and the general rubric of peace and conflict studies, but also scholars in the social sciences and humanities alike as well as policy makers and practitioners in the domains of governance, peace and national security.
